SOCIALISM EXPLAINED

E. T. Kingsley Lectures on the Relationship Between Capital and Labour.—An interesting Address

E. T. Kingsley, editor of the Clarion, Vancouver, lectured before a Revelstoke audience on Thursday night in the Selkirk hall on Socialism. Owing to the inclemency of the weather, perhaps, the attendance was small. H. Gough took the chair and introduced the lecturer to the audience. Mr. Kingsley rising to speak stated that he wished to correct a statement made regarding him as being an "orator" of repute. He denied that he was an orator but a man who spoke facts, but not as lawyers and actors, who, by eloquence, swayed the minds of men. We think, however, that Mr. Kingsley has not studied the meaning of the word orator if he holds out that oratory means sentimental and effusive talk. He then went on to explain the relationship between employers and employees, and brought out many instances endeavoring to show how the capitalist lays crushing hands on labor and forces him into subjection. He stated that the mill and factory, although they expressed large sums of money in themselves, are not capital unless worked by laborers who make the profit for their employers. If a man builds a factory and works it himself, that is without paying wages for its operation, then he is not a capitalist. He went on to describe how the workingman was the real producer of all goods, and not the capitalist, and denounced all those big concerns who employed men at a certain wage and made large profits, and thereby practically robbing the laborer of the fruits of his toil.

Now, we have no wish to comment on this speech, but nevertheless, there are many points where the lecturer gave an erroneous conception of the relationship between master and servant. He said that capital does not produce wealth, but takes it away from its rightful owner, the employees, that is, they rob the workingmen of what they have produced by an equivalent amount of labor power. The capitalists are practically useless as far as producing goods, is concerned, but workingmen make their factories valuable. He said that he would be pleased to see the downfall of so-called commercial businessmen, caused by strikes. Government is only another form of capitalism; the capitalists arrange matters in a way that they have it in their power to frame laws, rules and restrictions so that they can get the upper hand and reap in the large profit of their respective businesses. He disclaimed any superiority of either king or parliament over workingmen, saying that the king only held the power he does by robbing the laborer of what is justly his. He advocated that employees (or workingmen) the world over should turn round and say to their masters that they had decided to work the concern, what are they might be in particular, for themselves, and use the profits for better food, clothing and living. After discussing many points regarding the robbing system adopted by employers towards their laborers, and that the trouble between them would never be eliminated as long as the masters were on the top, and had the power of crushing their employees as much as they could in keeping wages low.

He then brought his lecture to a close. A collection was taken, and several members of the audience asked questions on many knotty parts, some of which caused the lecturer considerable difficulty in satisfactorily explaining, and the meeting terminated.

KRAO MINE SOLD

First Silver-Lead Shipper in Kootenay sold for $100,000

Never in the history of Kootenay has there been a more striking instance of perseverance rewarded than the sale of the Krao mine by A. D. Wheeler for $100,000. The sale has many important features. It means the immediate rehabilitation of Ainsworth camp and the influx of capital for legitimate mining from one of the most desirable sources—from men whose fortunes have been made in mining and who can and will operate intelligently. But to all Kootenay mining men and to old timers generally the feature of the story that affords most interest is that the man who has played the game honestly and pluckily for 22 years of varying fortunes has won at last. Mr. Wheeler confirms the story, now current, that a syndicate of Butte capitalists, headed by W. C. Lewis, had completed the purchase of the Krao mine for $100,000 and that the Krao Mining Co. would be organized at once in the big Montana camp with ample capital for operation on any required scale. W. E. Zwickey, manager of the Rambler-Cariboo, has taken formal possession of the Krao for the new owners.
